

Philip Joyce is Professor of Public Policy and Public Administration at The George Washington University. His research primarily focuses on the U.S. federal budget and the use of performance information in the budget process. He is the author of two books—Public Budgeting Systems (8th edition—with Robert D. Lee and Ronald Johnson) and Public Performance: Why Management Matters (with Patricia Ingraham and Amy Donahue), in addition to more than 40 articles and book chapters. Phil has 12 years of public sector work experience, including five years each with the U.S. Congressional Budget Office and the Illinois Bureau of the Budget. He has consulted internationally, both as an individual and with the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, in the People's Republic of China, Latvia, Slovenia and Mexico. Professor Joyce is a Fellow of the National Academy of Public Administration. He is a past President of the American Association of Budget and Program Analysis, and a past Chair of the Center on Accountability and Performance of the American Society for Public Administration.
